Japanese Buildings Saved from Wreckers.

BY JAMES O'DONNELL BENNETT

Chairman of the four-year-old official of the south park board as architectural consultant, has called the attention of the public to the preservation of the Japanese buildings which are to be the center of this year's fair.

"But you know," he said, "the old things do count. We must have some of the very old things preserved."

"What's going to happen to the old things?"

"I don't know," he replied. "But we have to do something about it."

The result of this interest is the establishment of the Japanese Building Preservation Society, which will work to save the buildings.

"The Japanese buildings are in danger," he said. "If we don't do something about it, they will be lost."

"What can we do to save them?"

"We can start by getting the word out," he said. "We can start by getting the word out."

"But how can we get the word out?"

"We can start by getting the word out," he said. "We can start by getting the word out."

"But what can we do to save the buildings?"

"We can start by getting the word out," he said. "We can start by getting the word out."

Japanese Buildings of the World's Fair of 1893, which have stood on Woodland Island in Jackson park for forty-one years, are being restored by the south park board with the aid of works funds administered.

The picturesque Japanese buildings of the World's Fair of 1893, which have stood on Woodland Island in Jackson park for forty-one years, are being restored by the south park board with the aid of works funds administered.